WHITE SERVITUDE IN MARYLAND

We have, however, found no case in the records where land was demanded by the servant that the court did not allow the claim.

With the abolition of the Conditions of Plantation by Charles Calvert in 1683, all connection between the distribution of land and the importation of servants came to an end. The latter now became purely an item of traffic between the importer and the planter who stood in need of the labor of the servant.

CHAPTER III.

NUMBER AND ECONOMIC IMPORTANCE.

The actual number of servants imported into Maryland and the ratio which they bore to the free inhabitants cannot easily be determined from the scanty records which have been left us. All historians of Maryland complain of the dearth of contemporaneous material. Outside of the purely legal documents, the settlers have left us very few journals or records of historical value. If the provisions of the laws were carried out, there are many valuable statistics which must have been collected, but which have not been found. For example, the laws required that all servants who entered the province should be registered at the county courts. One member of the Assembly of 1663 was enterprising enough to raise the question whether it would not be wise for the Secretary to preserve a list of all servants and passengers transported into Maryland. He was voted down by a vote of five to one, the Chancellor deciding that it was unnecessary.[1] No custom house record of passengers has been found earlier than the latter part of the nineteenth century. A law was passed by the Congress of the United States, in 1819, requiring an exact list of all immigrants entering the various ports of the United States to be sent to the State Department. This was done at first, but apparently only one such report was ever made. What few records are available concerning the number of servant immigrants come mainly from British sources.

There were no great migrations of peoples from Europe to Maryland which attracted the attention of travelers and writers, as did the arrival of the Palatines in New York and Pennsylvania. The growth of population in Maryland was more gradual. All foreigners were welcomed, and none became dominant. The large number of Germans in New York and Pennsylvania attracted many of their countrymen to visit them and write about them, while travelers who visited Baltimore and Annapolis usually confined their remarks to the soil, the climate, and the negroes.

For some time after the founding of the colony, the servants came exclusively from Great Britain, Ireland, and Virginia. Of the original immigrants the ratio of servants to freemen was probably about 6 to 1.[2]

In the Assembly of 1637, which all freemen were required to attend, only 90 appeared either in person or by proxy, leaving about 220 who must have been servants. This would make the ratio at this time 7 to 3. The increase in the proportion of freemen was due to the expiration of some of the servants' terms and to the immigration from Virginia.

Among the Calvert Papers is a manuscript which gives some clue to the proportion of servants a few years later. It is marked, "A note of all Warrants for the Granting of Land in Maryland." The document is undated, but the last entry is dated January 23, 1658, so the report was probably made out and sent to Baltimore about that time. It gives the names of the adventurers, the amount of land granted them, and the number of servants they had transported or were to transport within the next four years. The number of immigrants for whom land is received is 1078. This number does not represent the actual number of servants in Maryland at that time, as some of them were to be transported in future. On the other hand, we have seen that some neglected to claim land for the servants whom they had brought in with them. The number thus omitted in the report is probably as large or larger than the number to be transported in future, therefore the number given in the report is doubtless very nearly the number in the province. The number of inhabitants in Maryland in 1660 is given by Kennedy as 12,000.[3] A comparison of the two numbers gives the ratio of servants to freemen at about 1 to 11. This great increase of freemen over servants was due to the large influx from Virginia. By far the larger number of settlers for the first thirty years came from that colony. The Virginians complained that one-half of their province was depopulated to settle Maryland.[4] Most of the European immigrants at this time came from Great Britain and Ireland; later, the number was increased by arrivals from France, Holland, Bohemia, Spain, and Italy. Before 1649 there was very little inducement offered to foreigners except English and Irish. They were allowed neither land nor political rights. In that year the proprietor issued a proclamation allowing his brother to grant land to all foreigners, but they were not accorded full protection of the laws of the province till 1674.[5] With the exception of the Dutch, Swiss, and Germans, who came in large numbers in later years, very few of the immigrants from the continent came over as servants. In the notice of runaways given in the newspapers we occasionally come across a Frenchman, Swede, or even Jew, but the number is very small.

The census of Maryland taken in 1752 gives the number of free inhabitants as 98,357; servants, 6,870; convicts, 1,981.[6] This, again, gives the ratio of servants and convicts to the free population at about 1 to 11. From this, it would seem that the proportion of servants remained practically constant, and if so it would mean that quite a large proportion of the freemen had at one time been servants.

County Militia Rosters

These are names of soldiers appearing in the court minutes and orders of individual counties in Virginia. Most of the references are to officers in the county militia who, in order to receive their commissions, had to take the requisite oath of office to the crown. The date is the term of court in which the individual is mentioned. In a few counties the rank of the militia officer is not given so the designation "M.C." for military commission has been used.
